MeMo, books truly meant for children

Since 1993, éditions MeMo has built up a high-quality catalogue, based on the artistic and educational qualities of albums which are predominantly created by author-illustrators. These books work to develop a child's imagination, taste for art and knowledge, openness to others and capacity for discernment. The form of each book is very well thought out, so as to invite children to use the book as an object and to give them an early taste of independent reading.

Educational and artistic objectives

Authors and illustrators are chosen not only for their artistic qualities, but also for their storytelling talent and the depth of feeling that they evoke. We believe in children's own ability to choose what is best when they are offered quality images and stories. For children, a book is a window to the world, but it is also a place to experiment and explore their feelings, their fears and joys; a place to learn about life. Here are some examples of the skills that children should learn through books, and some authors who respond particularly well to these:

Discover writing, quantities and numbers with Anne Bertier. Discover shapes and sizes with Gay Wegerif. Discover the living, learn the major events of plant and animal life with Anne Crausaz and Émilie Vast. Cooperate and become independent, experience self-confidence, and learn emotional control with Malika Doray... these are just a few of the educational objectives in our «Growing up with éditions MeMo books» range.

The book: a precious and irreplaceable object

It is our belief that in this age of the eBook and the «merchandisation» of content, the paper book should retain its position as an irreplaceable object. Since 1993, every éditions MeMo book has its own format and typography. We print on thick paper which is similar to drawing paper, meaning everyone can get their hands on something that appears just as valuable as the original. For this purpose, we do a considerable amount of photo-engraving, spending weeks working in close cooperation with the author tweaking each image before printing. The care that is taken over the image and the object itself generates a pleasure that enriches children's reading and makes them sensitive to its content. They learn to appreciate the artistic quality of the book.

The classics of past and present

In this guide, we have selected predominantly contemporary books that speak to younger children using very simple words and images. These books are held in particularly high regard amongst book promoters, librarians, and professionals in the field of early childhood.

We have also included books which form part of the heritage of the illustrated children's book. These are quality books that have crossed time and borders. They have survived and retained the same charm and power. Much like musical and literary works for adults, good books for children are universal. Future classics and timeless classics; this is the éditions MeMo editorial agenda.

Les Trois Gibbons (The Three Gibbons)

The Three Gibbons are playing together. Their names are Ibbon, Nibbon and Sabbon. They have round faces and thanks to their long limbs they can do all sorts of acrobatics. It is such a joy to see them rolling and bouncing; we share with them the pleasure of simple discoveries... The Three Gibbons is the first of a new series.

Les Trois Gibbons et le crocodile (The Three Gibbons and the Crocodile)

Out on a stroll, the Three Gibbons come across a tiny crocodile trapped in a hole. Is he dangerous? He looks like a baby... The Three Gibbons decide to come to his help. The next day as they rest in the sun, a big crocodile makes for them. What is about to happen? Let's catch up in this new volume with the Three Gibbons, visually simple as they are, but so expressive and dynamic.

La laisse (The Leash)

A great ape strolls through the forest, dragging behind him a leash. But what is at the end of this leash? There is a dog, who also holds a leash... We find out on the next page who is at the end of the leash, and so on and so forth, in this little game of Who Drags Who that takes us underground, in the air, and underwater. We can only wonder: what are they in search of? ...or who? Admire the fluid stroke of the pen and the mischievous narration full of surprises in this debut by author-illustrator Marion Barraud.

Écrire c'est dessiner (To Write is to Draw)

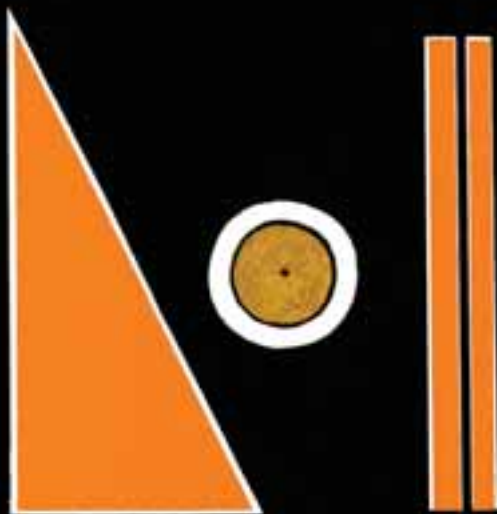

Learning to write for a child often amounts to repeating lines of writing in order to assimilate the codes particular to the cursive style. Yet, before they start writing all children begin with drawing.

This is the point of this book: how to start from drawing to progressively write. This game-book takes its place within the cannon of traditional writing methods (Palmer, Spencer...) which flagged up the virtues of "penmanship" through inventive script writing exercises.

Le temps des couleurs (Colour Time)

After the games on number combinations and shapes, after constructions, arabesques and cuts to the rhythm of letters, comes colour time. In this very small album in the form of a colour chart, Anne Bertier tells the story of colours using haikus tinted by dreams, with the intense colours of a daydream and poetic journey. The colours change with the turn of each page and invite us on a vast, motionless journey.

Play with numbers

In this new series, Anne Bertier gives a graphic interpretation of the signs for basic arithmetic operations. The simple red and black shapes which bring the pages to life make these books a wonderful visual experience, as the forms appear and disappear in response to the shift between full and empty.

Pourquoi tu ne m'aimes pas ? (Why Don't You Like Me?)

Based on a text by Françoise Armengaud. Why don't you like me? Fox asks a weasel, a horse, a lion, a hare, a crow this important question... and even asks his own reflection when he sees it in the river... The simple, paper cutout figures enable this very sensitive topic to be treated in a calm, reassuring way.

Bonjour les animaux (Hello, Animals)

“Hello cat. See you later dog. I can’t take you with me today, we’re going to the zoo.” Ducks, ostriches, chimpanzees, snakes and big cats appear across the double page spreads as the young narrator takes us on a visit to the zoo. She discovers the animals, marvels at them, is sometimes scared, but keeps going. The book’s large format gives us a child’s-eye view of the zoo world. Porcupines, lions... they are all awesome to her. She acquaints herself this unfamiliar universe and returns home, happy to find her cat and dog waiting. There are no cages in this book and the boundaries between wild and domestic animals become blurred. The cat and the panther are not so different after all.

Et le matin... (In the Morning as the Sun Rises) Et le soir... (In the Evening as Night Falls)

Anne Crausaz has created two small board books that alternate, follow on, or can be read in isolation. In the morning, we witness the waking of the animals and the little ones that went to sleep in the other book. But the owlets that spent the entire night flying are tired when the sun rises! The cockerel wakes the chickens, the dog pricks up its ears, barks and... The children wake up full of energy. In the evening, whilst the weasels and the badgers come out to eat and the owls teach their owlets to fly silently, the children are getting ready for bed and the adults are reading them stories.

The quality of this book stems from the beauty of the pictures, but also the presentation which jumps from night to day and day to night making it dynamic to read and easy to share.

La vie est une berceuse (Life is a Lullaby)

Life is a lullaby that we should learn how to listen to... and big rabbit is singing from one side... and the other... This is how Malika's book begins rocking to the rhythm of day and night, over and under, day after day. And within this rocking motion care is taken, love is lavished, respecting baby's own rhythms.

Si les parents lapins dorment avec leurs enfants... (Sleeping Together?)

So, how do we go about explaining that rabbit parents and children sleep in their own separate beds? By telling them off? Ok, just for tonight. And what about the rabbit grandparents? Maybe they'd like to sleep with their children? And the rabbit uncles and aunts would like to snuggle up with their parents. What a mess!

Le nez (The Nose)

This very funny, epic tale is freely inspired by the novel by Nikolai Gogol. It all starts with the search for a big hanky: "Since we all have a blocked nose, the only thing to do is find a big hanky." A nose posse goes off in search of a "big hanky" or is it a "big hungy"? Stuffed with confusions and sudden turn of events, this story should be told with a blocked nose, or rather a blocked dose!

Le Petit Brown (Little Boy Brown)

With a text by Isobel Harris.
Translated by Françoise Morvan.
Little Boy Brown is a young boy living in New York whose first-person narrative tells of the urbanized, existence of his parents. One day, Hilda, the maid takes him to visit her family in the country, where he's about to discover the joys of lighting a fire, helping Hilda make a cake and stroking the family dog. It has been a marvellous day that has changed the life of Little Boy Brown and his view of others. A gentle tale that seems to be about nothing in particular but deals with a boy growing up.
First edition of Little Boy Brown, since it was published in the United States in 1949.

De l'origine des mathématiques (On the Origin of Mathematics)

"If Man finds mathematics complicated, he's got no one to blame but himself" — this somewhat pithy pronouncement by Clémence Gandillot in his treatise on mathematics is a powerful summing-up of his thesis: that mathematics is created in the image of Man — and Woman.

When Les Très petits [The Classic Tales] were published, Georges Meurant and éditions MeMo agreed there was a need for a monograph on the œuvre of children's book illustrator Elisabeth Ivanovsky. We are now able to offer readers a high-quality analysis of her work and a complete bibliography. The illustrations section is devoted to her little-known works and to her emblematic pictures. The exhaustive bibliography will serve as a resource for studying her work in its historical context, i.e. the illustration of children's books from the 1940s to the 1990s.

La visite (The Guest)

A family is at the park; a white cat slinks between the trees. Back home, the black cat looks out of the window. After dark, a curious visit takes place: in the cosy, warm glow of the living room, the two cats become human size, wear human clothes, sip tea and swap news. What does that letter in the picture say? What is the white cat thinking, as it gazes out of the window?

In this wordless picture book rather like a Christmas story, Junko Nakamura displays her considerable talent. Sometimes close up, sometimes from a distance, navigating between the world of children and that of cats, between indoors and outdoors, she creates a fluid narrative, where every image is both timeless and compelling. Her intense but subtle use of light is key, giving movement and life to the narrative. The children's reunion with their cat brings us back down to earth, but we are still immersed in the magic of the story.

Il faut que j'y aille (I Need to Go)

"I need to go" exclaims a kitten. But, before he does, he needs to prepare and carefully select his supplies. All done, the adventure can start. Our intrepid kitten goes on a tour of the house on his own and ventures forth ...into the kitchen. This story may not take the character on a faraway journey but depicts his determination to experience freedom.

Nous allons au bois (Let's Go in the Woods)

"Let's Go in the Woods" treats its young readers to a trip mixing pages of action and reflexion. Past the brook, we come across blueberries. A double silent page lets us then admire the lake before we make our way back home. The blueberries are used for a tart and the circle is complete, mixing the fun of this adventure and daily life.

Junko Nakamura uses markers to convey a faux-naïve tone in this all graphic novel and offers a very engaging graphics that serves the story of a cat family which we shall meet again in a second book, "I Need to Go", where the child goes on an adventure, this time on his own...

C'est parce que je suis aviateur.

Hubert Poirot-Bourdain

L'aviateur (The Aviator)

The aviator lives with his head in the clouds. He takes off every morning to observe the world from high above. A terrible storm breaks out one day despite a clear sky and sends the aviator crashing with his plane into the hills. He is safe, but his engine is a mere wreck. This is when he will make a life-changing encounter... The Aviator is a tribute to the Aeropostale pioneers. This is the imaginary story of Guillaumet, Saint-Exupery, Mermoz, and all the others who kept pushing back the frontiers of what is possible. The Aviator deals with the idea of choosing a course ...and then changing it!

Animaux à mimer (Let's Play Animals)

French text by Valérie Rouzeau in collaboration with Odile Belkeddar. In a series of fantastical little scenes, this story in verse tells how Fedia, Lacha, Gavrik and the other children play at turning themselves into all sorts of animals using items of clothing and other useful things they find to hand. Created in 1926, the work never left the drawing-board in Russia, with Tretiakov's text and some of Rodtchenko's photographs appearing separately in magazines. La Collection des Trois Ourses is the book's first appearance in French and includes the original photographic plates, reproduced with the permission of Alexander Lavrentiev, Rodtchenko's grandson.

Le secret (The Secret)

Fox has a secret. She can't keep it any longer, so she tells Rabbit. «Oh! Extraordinary», said Rabbit. Rabbit has a secret. He can't keep it any longer, so he tells Dragonfly... And so on, each one is told the secret and then whispers it in a friend's ear. What is it? The birth of a fox cub... which is no longer a secret when the news reaches...

Le chant de Colombine (Colombine's Song)

Colombine wants to capture the attention of a Pierrot. Page after page, bird after bird, she learns a note from each one. Finally, using them all together, she adds to the melody words from a love song that will seduce her Pierrot. Learning the musical scale is always an entertaining exercise and here it is accompanied by Émilie's illustrations and associated with a well-known tune, combining learning with pleasure.

Petit à petit (Little by Little)

From the smallest to the biggest, the animals follow each other on the deck while the water rises gradually. The story is known. Émilie Vast tells us once again with her animals talking about the carelessness of men. Little by little is a modern and graphic fable on climate changes and a wonderful menagerie.

Couac (Quack)

Once he has broken out of his eggshell, this character, not quite the Ugly Duckling, discovers the world around him and other people's opinions. Since the ducks reject him, he sets off in search of a more welcoming place. On his way he will have several encounters: an eagle, a penguin, a pelican... until the day he finally discovers who he really is. This book tells the story of the first steps of existence, wonder, beginner's clumsiness, then of education and self-confidence and is accessible to early years.

This is an adaptation of the stage show Couac created for the very young by Angélique Friant for the Succursale 101 company. Émilie Vast has brought this graphical universe to life.

Comment tout a commencé (How It All Started)

We cross more than 3.4 billion years in a handful of pages: from the appearance of the first single-cell organism in the oceans to the complex life-forms that populate today's grounds, seas and heavens. The story of these continuous transformations tried out by Nature on all of its creatures is illustrated with simple and straightforward illustrations. Just like with her first book, "The ABC of Peoples", whose characters were all depicted in the same fashion, Liuna Virardi offers with How It All Started a reflection on the exchanges Mankind has with the surrounding world, this world with whom we share a past as well as a future. Continuity in this relationship is crucial for evolution to follow its course. Life/ Evolution/ Origins

ABC des peuples (The ABC of Civilisation)

From a limited number of shapes, we can draw all the different peoples of the world. This is what Liuna Virardi shows us in this ABC of Civilisation, representing 26 of them to begin with! Each letter of the alphabet is associated with one civilisation and gives a presentation of its lifestyle, illustrated by a face made up of coloured stamps. A map at the back of the book allows readers to situate the carte groups of people they have met

Miam (Yummy!)

"An apple? Yummy! I'll crunch it," said the horse. "Some lettuce? Yummy! I'll nibble it," said the rabbit. "Some corn? Yummy! I'll peck it," said the hen. Gay Wegerif uses different animals to develop her subject — children will learn the vocabulary for the diet of each one, and, in the process discover one creature who is always in the mood for dessert.

Zou! (Zoom!)

The horse gallops, "clip-clop, clip-clop". The duck waddles, "flip-flop, flip-flop". The rabbit goes, "boing, boing", but what noise does the snail make when he goes for a walk?... Gay Wegerif approaches her subject — here the noises that animals make when moving — as in her previous books. It's all an excuse for a pictorial game and a funny ending that will have little children in stitches.

La clé (The Key)

Out for a walk, a field mouse, a hare and a lemur find a garden. They walk around it a few times, then get bored. Then they find a key, poking out of the earth. Someone must have lost it. They pull and pull until they wrench it out of the ground. What door or chest does it open? Adventure beckons...

As in her previous work, La forêt invisible [The invisible forest], Julia Woignier uses delicate watercolors to explore animal, human and universal nature. The result is a dazzling story about the search for freedom and for peaceful cohabitation between humans and nature.

Drôle d'oiseau (A Funny Bird)

What a funny bird... It appears to us to be "in hiding", only revealing itself when it stands out against a particular background. This difference has an effect on the bird, making it adorn itself with feathers and leaves so it can look like other birds. It becomes very beautiful and attracts attention immediately... unfortunately from the fox. A game of appearances and disappearances, and a tale told with colour images that illustrate the story to beautiful effect.

Un jour (One Day)

A small red bird is sitting in his tree feeling bored. He flies across the urban forest and the dangers of the big city, but finally finds the company he has longed for back in his own tree. Inspired by the traditions in Korean art, Yoo Ju-Yeon uses Indian ink and coloured stamps to create a powerful contemporary universe that lies between Asian tradition and Western modernity.
